The last century has seen a concerted effort to move disparate religions towards one another in the hopes of reconciling differences around a common concern for humanity and shared experience of a better future. While there have been numerous political and rhetorical setbacks, our shared pursuit of the transcendent and divine compels us to come to the table of fellowship once and again so as to learn where we can be better individuals as well as collect new insights. This is not a new endeavor, though sadly we have not always been as forthright. Intellectual imperialism has prevailed in religious studies – claiming insight to God by revelation when in point of fact, a prophet has encountered another faith practice and repurposed it. One such example is the Christian concept of Kingdom of God which, unique and central to the Christian experience, is hardly novel. This paper will proceed to elucidate the ways in which the “Kingdom of God” has borrowed from their Jewish heritage of kingdom language, namely tikkun olam. While the Kingdom of God may be the most obvious topic raised by the Synoptic Gospels and Pauline epistles, it is hardly as exclusive as Christian writers seem to claim.

To discuss the Kingdom in the Jewish imagination is to speak of tikkun olam (Heb. “repairing the world”). To claim that the idea of the Kingdom is “the pivot point of Christianity”<sup>1</sup> is somewhat true to contemporary theologians, but incorrectly implies that both the term “Kingdom” as well as the theological developments and understanding behind the expression are the exclusive domain of Christianity. It is rather, one of – but not the exclusive – concern of both Jewish and Christian thinking. As will become clear,
